The report shows that the use of a single common, trusted storage system—such as one backed by cold storages—for all data on a networked computer system is the optimal method. The results determined that the most cost-effective and reliable method for storing data on a networked computer system is to use a single, centrally-managed, shared system. In a statement on the findings, CEO of the Bish Bureau of Intelligence Nigel Sage said: "The Bish Bureau of Intelligence was formed to protect against the shadowy influences of Unknown the Unknown. It's only appropriate, therefore, that our first policy for data storage is to deploy trusted, centrally managed, and best-of-breed systems. It's what we are best at."
